May 2020	Sassari, Italy	University of Sassari, Security and International Cooperation	Student	Degree, in Cooperation and security international. 110 e lode. Title thesis: Physical violence and sexual violence in EAC countries: comparative statistical analysis on the main risk factors. Abstract: The gender-based violence is recognised worldwide as an important public health and social problem, with far reaching consequences for women's physical and emotional health and social well-being. In this work, I tried to address the phenomenon of gender-based violence by focusing my attention on Tanzania, a country that I visited during a training internship carried out thanks to the "Ulisse" Student Mobility Program of the University of Sassari. In the first chapter, I outlined the complex economic, health and social situation in Tanzania, where women's emancipation still represents a hypothesis far from being accepted and implemented. In the second chapter, the various types of gender-based violence are defined and, through the narratives of the Tanzanian women whom I had the privilege of knowing during my stay in Pomerini, their difficulties are described, from birth, to childhood, to adolescence, until marriage and after reaching the old age. In the third chapter, I analyzed the data extrapolated from the Demographic and Health Surveys (USAID) programme for five countries belonging to the East African Community (Burundi, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania and Uganda), aiming to understanding which, among some objective factors considered (age, residence, marital status, education, standard of living, employment), have the greatest influence on the incidence of physical and sexual violence suffered by women in these countries.
